

About the Evolution of the National Security Concept

D.K. Valeev¹, N.N. Makolkin² and D.A. Lipinsky³

^{1,2}Kazan Federal University Department of Environmental, Labor Law and Civil Procedure, Kazan, Russia

³*Togliatti State University Department of Theory of State and Law, Tolyatti, Russia*
E-mail: ¹<valeev55@gmail.com>, ²<nikita.makolkin@gmail.com>, ³<Dmitri8@yandex.ru>

KEYWORDS Constitutional Law. Integrated Approach. National Security. Normativity. Scientific and Legislative Evolution

ABSTRACT This study dealt with the scientific and legislative evolution of the “national security” concept, as well as a system of views on this political, social, and legal phenomenon. Therefore, both legal and scientific changes in the national security concept were analyzed. It is well known that signs of national security such as normativity, target nature, protection of primary interests, and so forth are disclosed from the position of a systematic approach. Therefore, the human right to security was specially considered. It was concluded that national security must be defined as a constitutional law of a subject belonging to the category of natural ones. Besides, it must already be enshrined in the amended Constitution in the case of constitutional reform. Moreover, it was found that understanding national security as a complex formation requires the implementation of an integrated approach.